ABSTRACT

The 12-month Federally funded project at the University of Bridgeport, Connecticut was designed to prepare adult basic education (ABE) administrators and teachers (serving urban Puerto Ricans, blacks, and whites) to become teacher trainers. Focus was on building a multi-regional teacher capability in ABE through teacher training models. Phase one involved program planning and pre-conference orientation of participants and resource personnel. A three-week on-campus workshop, phase two, centered on an in-depth study of learning modules selected by the participants. Modules selected pertained to: the nature of the undereducated urban adult learner, communication, fostering positive self-perception of urban ABE students, micro-teaching, methods and diagnosis of ABE teaching, teaching English as a second language (ESL), and diagnosis of local needs and program development. Phase three, designed to actualize the urban teacher training developed during the previous phase, proved to be the most significant part of the project. Through a task team capability delivery system, programs were launched in: Bridgeport; Raleigh, North Carolina; Amherst, Massachusetts; Glenmont, New York. An important outcome of the project was model dissemination at local, State, regional, and national levels. One-third of the document consists of appendixes providing supplementary institute program information. (EA)

PREFACE

Today, a major priority in staff development is the training of personnel to effectively teach adults. Generally, the task of preparing ABE teachers who are at various levels of experience has been left largely to chance. A few colleges and universities provide teacher training for ABE teachers as do some state departments of education. Indeed, by 1970 only thirty-one of 160 NCATE accredited teacher training institutions had some form of ABE teacher training as reported by a recent national study. But the problems of the undereducated and disadvantaged adult are such that more than just chance is needed when considering the preparation of personnel and the implementation of local in-service training programs. It is imperative that creative and significant efforts be directed to the preparation of a cadre of ABE specialists who can develop competence and effectiveness in providing and carrying out local ABE training programs. Adult educators must use the available manpower, technology, and knowhow to meet this problem, and they must not delay.

This project then was submitted as a response to the need at the local and the national levels for well-qualified teachers for undereducated adults. It was designed to prepare ABE administrators and teachers who serve urban Puerto Ricans, blacks and whites to become teacher-trainers. Basically, it focused on developing a process of building a multi-regional teacher training capability in ABE through the training of ABE teacher trainers. Central to this keep was the development of teacher training models which would be implemented and monitored in the several regions.

The report which follows provides an outline of the purposes, objectives, training design, and outcomes of the ABE teacher training project conducted at the University of Bridgeport in FY 1971.

Pumerantz, Philip, Keane, Edward and Shaw, Rebecca. "Adult Basic Education Teacher Training Programs in Accredited Teacher Training Institutions in the United States", The University of Bridgeport, Fall, 1970

Part I

PURPOSE OF THE PROJECT

The major purpose of this Institute was to prepare teams of ABE specialists to organize, develop, and administer local preservice and inservice ABE teacher training programs which serve urban Puerto Rican, urban black, and urban white populations. Once trained, these teams would conduct training programs at the state and local levels in their own areas and thereby multiply the effect of the training they themselves received. A unique feature of the Institute was that it provided for the delivery of an ongoing teacher training network and for continuous self-renewal for ABE teachers. In this regard, the University of Bridge-port responded to the national need for leadership in the field of urban ABE teacher training by developing creative professional preparation models.

General Objectives

The general objectives of the project were as follows:

- 1. The achievement of a quality of teaching in ABE in which the concept of the individualized instruction becomes more than just rhetoric--but, a reality in terms of the interest, needs, and lives of undereducated adults.
- 2. The identification of the constantly changing needs in urban ABE teacher education.
- 3. The expansion of the insight and understanding of teaching-learning in urban Adult Basic Education and an identification of gaps in knowledge and problem areas which can be handled in training and in research.
- 4. The continued expansion of the traditional public school teacher-training role of the University of Bridgeport to include the training of urban local ABE administrators and teachers as teacher-trainers; and, in a larger sense, to expand the program in adult education which was developed at the University in 1970-71.

5. The development of teacher-training models which could be replicated and implemented in urban settings at the local and state levels.

Specific Objectives

Upon the completion of the Institute, each participant would be expected to perform any of the following tasks which would be appropriate to the learning modules he selects

- 1. Identify the characteristics of the undereducated urban adult in social, economic, and psychological terms.
- 2. Differentiate between adult learning and child and adolescent learning.
- 3. Design an urban ABE teacher training program model which focuses on individualized instruction and contains some innovative adult teaching methods such as simulation; role-playing; diagnosis and prescription; micro-teaching; etc.
- 4. Develop an ABE teacher training program model which is based on the principles of adult learning in an urban setting.
- 5. Develop an urban ABE teacher training program model which is based on the social, economic, and psychological characteristics of undereducated and disadvantaged adults.
- 6. Construct a curriculum which breaks out of the confines of departments and combines basic academic skills and basic living skills.
- 7. Select appropriately prepared learning materials for disadvantaged adults which will facilitate individualized instruction.
- 8. Evaluate learning materials from commercial sources by using guidelines shown to be successful in the field.
- 9. Develop in-class learning materials for disadvantaged adults which will facilitate individualized instruction.
- 10. Evaluate in-class learning materials by using guidelines shown to be successful in the field.

- 11. Identify various ways in which community resource linkages can enhance ABE teacher training.
- 12. Construct instruments and design procedures which will give data about a teacher's ability to teach and a student's ability to learn.
- 13. Construct instruments and design procedures which will give data about the capability of an ABE program as a whole.
- 14. Use prepared instruments to get data about teaching, learning, and program.
- 15. Translate the findings derived from various data-gathering sources about teaching, learning, and programs into procedures aimed at bringing about change in these areas.
- 16. Implement the urban teacher training models developed in the Institute by organizing ABE teacher training programs back home.

Part II

METHODOLOGY

The project covered a twelve-month program which began on June 1, 1971 and ran through May 31, 1972. It involved carefully prescribed stages of problem identification; program planning; pre-conference orientation of participants and resource personnel; a three-week on campus workshop; and finally, follow-up activities for implementation and evaluation. Three phases provided the organizational structure for the Institute.

In Phase I, beginning in June 1971, the Institute staff, (Appendix A) with the cooperation of an Advisory Council, participants of previous ABE Institutes, and several local ABE directors identified various areas of study and method-ologies which had implications for urban ABE teacher-training. This information was acquired via correspondence, personal visits, small group meetings, and conferences.

During this first phase, pre-workshop materials were prepared and distributed to the participants, and final arrangements were made for the use of human and material resources in the workshop.

Phase II was the operation of the three-week on-campus workshop held at the University of Bridgeport from August 9 to August 27, 1971. (Appendix B).

The first two weeks of the resident workshop were devoted to the in-depth study of learning modules participants selected and to the performance of the skills or tasks related to each module.

A unique feature of the workshop was its focus on the learning modules. Since this project was committed to be a model itself of sound instructional and organizational practices for ABE, it was essential that the design of the training be a creative and viable alternative to traditional training arrangements. Typically, students in courses in courses or participants in workshops are faced with a series of topics and lectures through which they must perservere and for which they receive terminal credit or recognition in the form of a grade or a certificate. Often it is questionable whether one can adequately develop the conceptual, technical and human skills necessary to be accounted learned in the areas of study undertaken. This is especially true when one is faced with a great number of topics in a short period of time. In this workshop then, instead of having participants face a number of topics during a three week period and then assume that they will be proficient in these, they worked in an open climate with an opportunity to make choices based on a cooperative assessment of their needs. In this atmosphere of co-directed adult learning the institute presented truly individualized alternatives to participants.

A number of learning modules or components were made available to the participants so that the advantages of the latest thinking in the areas of ABE were on display for each student. In this context each participant was encouraged to select modules for study which were the most immediately important to him in the pursuit of his individual educational ends. A participant could choose to study in depth from the modules provided. This effort on the part of the individual to make decisions about his individual professional development, was a significant part of the Institute.

It should be noted that the modules selected reflected the need as perceived by the Institute Advisory Council. Meetings held in the Fall 1970 in Atlanta, Boston, and Washington under the sponsorship of the University of Bridgeport provided much of the input needed to design the program proposed here. Since the project focused on training persons who served urban populations, content and instruction were consistent with this setting.

The following learning modules, therefore, were included in the three week resident workshop of the Institute:

- 1. The Nature of the Undereducated Urban Adult Learner.
- 2. Communication (role playing and simulation).
- 3. Fostering positive self-perception on the part of urban' ABE students.
- 4. Micro-teaching.
- 5. Methods of ABE Teaching.
- 6. Methods of Teaching English as a Second Language.
- 7. Diagnosis and Prescription in ABE Teaching.
- 8. Diagnosis of local teacher training needs and program development.

The third week of the workshop was devoted almost entirely to a practicum. Here each participant had an opportunity to work on an individual basis with the Institute staff and instructors in defining and redefining their teacher training models, and getting them ready to be brought home for implementation.

To deal more effectively with instruction, participants were divided into three study groups. Each group member was responsible for designing a realistic urban teacher education program which would prepare the personnel responsible for teaching disadvantaged urban adults. For the purpose of effective study and program planning, the groups were composed of participants from different geographical areas.

Each participant's teacher training model would dilineate the components of a professional development program for urban ABE teachers. It would be applicable to the needs of the educationally disadvantaged adult in the geographical area of the respective participants. Each study group was assisted by full time staff members who were Adult Basic Education specialists.

Phase III of the Institute began immediately upon the conclusion of the resident workshop and was designed to actualize the urban teacher training models developed during Phase II. This phase also involved the dissemination of these models nationally.

The central thrust of the Phase III program was a diagnosis of teacher training needs of the local areas and the delivery of a teacher training capability under the leadership of the Institute graduates. Since the residential workshop centered on the examination, in depth, of the specific needs and problems of the participants to the end that they could plan on-going programs of professional development, the transition from Phase III to Phase III was relatively smooth.

This project utilized The Task Team Capability Delivery System, a concept developed in the 1970 ABE Institute at Bridgeport. (A discussion of the Task Team idea will be given in Part III in this report.)

Participants

The participants for this Institute consisted of twenty-nine ABE teachers and administrators selected from urban centers in the eastern half of the nation.

(Appendix C). More specifically, they were chosen from those who served urban Puerto Ricans, urban blacks, and urban whites.

Participants were selected according to the following criteria:

- 1. Must possess a baccalaureate degree and be qualified to pursue graduate studies at the master's level.
- 2. Must be (or was to be) engaged full time or part time in an ABE program which serves urban Puerto Ricans, urban blacks, and urban whites.
- 3. Must be involved in some aspect of in-service or preservice training of teachers in ABE or ESL.

- 4. Must agree to conduct at least one teacher training program in ABE or ESL upon return to their local area.
- 5. Must provide a letter of recommendation and certification from their state ABE Director that they will be involved in an ABE teacher training program.

The selection of participants was guided if the Institute Advisory Council which was composed of State ABE Directors and RPO's of Regions I-IV.

Brochures announcing the program and its purposes and outlining all pertinent information were prepared in advance of the starting date and were sent to the State Directors and RPO's. Moreover, three semester hours of graduate credit were offered to each participant who successfully completed the workshop.

OUTCOMES

Task Team Delivery System

Phase III proved to be the most significant part of the project. This involved the actualization of the urban ABE teacher training capabilities via the Task Team Concept. This idea was conceived in the FY 1970 USOE funded ABE Institute held at the University of Bridgeport.

The Task Team Delivery System was based on the idea that adults have certain needs and resources that are brought to every learning situation. Once these needs and resources are identified, process and content assistance could be added by institute graduates and consultants to attack the problems indicated. The graduates had the opportunity to transfer their newly acquired knowledge to meet on-the-line problems. This is the process of continuing education and self-directed inquiry.

The Task Team Capability Delivery System was the follow-up vehicle for Phase III. The Task Team was composed of Institute graduates from states within a convenient geographic area. Each team member was an instructor-consultant and shared in the responsibility of the Task Team to carry out ABE teacher training. The team became the vehicle by which the teacher training skills developed in the resident workshop at the University in Phase II were brought to bear on actual professional development needs of urban adult basic educators within the Task Team's geographic area. This instructional team had the strength of combined skill and resources to help meet actual ABE teacher training needs which could emerge. Moreover, the team could bring in additional consultative help to augment its resources.

An Advisory Council made up of state ABE directors, RPO's and a process consultant was available for the Team. The consultant was a member of the Institute staff whose major responsibility was to offer technical assistance in designing and launching a Task Team program.

Four Task Team programs were designed and launched in Phase III. They were carried out in Bridgeport, Connecticut in October; in Raleigh, North Carolina in December; in Amherst, Massachusetts in January; and in Glenmont, New York in February. (Appendix D).

The Task Team Capability Delivery System offered all institute participants a meaningful and workable method of putting their teacher training skills into operation. Such an approach reaped many satellite benefits, such as, communication of ideas, identification of common problems, awareness of resources, exchange of innovative techniques, etc.

Most importantly, however, the Task Team idea provided the on-the-line adult basic educator with the tools and the plan of action to solve quickly and effectively the complex teacher training needs of an ABE learning center. Through this multiplyer effect, a new well-prepared cadre of adult teacher training specialists now can begin to respond more significantly, on the urban front, to the problems of adult illiteracy, poverty and despair.

Dissemination

Since the processes and outcomes of this project had national as well as regional significance in application, arrangements were made to make the Teacher Training Models developed for the Institute available nationally.

This was an important outcome of this project since the models were developed by institute graduates. These were disseminated nationally and abroad to be used as guides to mount and launch inservice training programs at the local, state, regional, or national levels. The adult educator interested in bringing a professional development capability to his program could replicate these models either in full or he could adapt the various components to fit his unique situation. The models focused on urban settings and included practical illustrations of how a number of ABE programs could join forces in co-sponsoring inservice training programs. The components in the models reflected the latest thinking in ABE instructional methodology and curriculum. (See Appendix E for sample titles of ABE Urban Teacher Training Models).

Associate Professor of Education
University of Bridgeport

Introduction

The major purpose of this mini-institute is to provide teachers of Adult Basic Education and/or English as a second language with the skills necessary to go beyond mere rhetoric of "ianovation and improvement" to actual practice of mastering new teaching strategies. The instructional components which will be utilized at the mini-institute to aid in achieving the above are: Adult Basic Education - lesson construction and practicum, English as a second language - lesson construction will emphasize the importance of individualization in the classroom. Experienced Adult Basic Education teachers and administrators who have recently completed an intensive three week training institute at the University of Bridgeport will provide the instruction supplemented by nationally recognized Adult Basic Education consultants. The task team delivery system developed at the University of Bridgeport will be used at the minimistitute. Members of task team III will be responsible for conducting segments of training.

The theme of this mini-institute is:

"Performance In The Classroom"

Program Components

The instructional components which will be utilized at the mini-institute are the following:

- Adult Basic Education Lesson construction and practicum
- English as a Second Language Lesson construction and practicum
- Interaction Analysis of Teaching Behavior

Institute Training Design

Prior to registration at the mini-institute, participants will receive a list of selected readings to be used for various components. Participants who intend to choose interaction analysis at the outset will be expected to come with prepared ABE/ESL lessons. Participants who expect to choose ABE or ESL modules will be asked to bring resource materials which they have found useful.

Participants will register and meet late Thursday afternoon February 3, 1972, at the Center for Humanistic Education, Glenmont, (Albany) New York. Sharing of ideas and discussion of prospective learning experiences will begin over dinner at 6:00 P.M. Social activities will aid in team building on Thursday evening for best selection of program components.

Both morning and afternoon sessions on Friday will be devoted to learning and performance in the area of participants choice. The evening session will be devoted to a pooling and sharing of learning experiences.

On Saturday, a participant may continue development in the same module or change to another module for the remainder of the day. The institute will end after an evaluation and summary about 2:00 P.M.

Follow-Up-Program

The follow-up-phase of the mini-institute will operate in the following manner:

- 1. Visits by coope ating mini-institute staff.
- 2. Analysis of teaching behavior and on-site discussion.
- 3. Sharing meeting with and for participants.

The follow up program will be optional for all participants.

General Objectives

The general objectives for this mini-institute are:

- To provide for teachers the opportunity to become more skillful in the latest methods and techniques which are appropriate and effective in adult basic education classrooms.
- To demanstrate effective means of constructing ABE/ESL classroom lessons.
- To introduce teachers to the verbal interaction analysis techniques as an aid to improving instruction.
- To aid teachers in developing skills to teach effectively English as a second language.
- To encourage the teacher to constantly improve his classroom behavior in order to stimulate student learning.

Specific Objectives
